Pulpwood Production Up

Pulpwood production in Virginia hit an all time high last year.

Carl J. Holcomb, forester for VPI Agricultural Extension Service, citing a report from the Southeastern Forest Experiment Station, says pulpwood production rose 18 percent last year over 1958, showing a larger percentage increase than any other southern state. Production last year reached 1,728,400 cords of wood, of which 402,000 was hardwood, 1,241,800 was pine.

Holcomb says the most significant part of this record was the production of the equivalent of 84,600 cords of pulp chips from sawmill waste. The past five years have seen a trend toward the use of slabs and edgings from sawmills for chips to make paper.

To make wood chips from wood waste for paper manufacture, bark is usually removed from sawlogs at the sawmills. Logs are then sawed into lumber and a chipping machine located at the mill grinds the slabs and edgings into chips. The chips are then shipped to the pulp and paper mills by rail or truck. Heretofore sawmill waste has been used for fuel or left to rot at the sawmill site.

Production of wood chips for paper making is one of the top conservation measures, Holcomb says. The 1959 production of 84,600 cords of chips represents the annual growth on the same number of acres of good pine land.

This year the use of chips should expand even more, Holcomb believes. Many Virginia mills have recently bought equipment for chip production. The pulp and paper mills are contracting for more. In a few years, the forester says, almost all the waste wood from sawmills should be converted to paper.

Our Need of God

Lesson for October 23, 1960

MAN'S NEED of God is his highest dignity. This was the conclusion of a great thinker a century ago. But he was not alone in this discovery. Down through the generations, people high and low have found out that to need God is not a sign of shiftlessness and inferiority, but of dignity. The down - and - outs, the failures, the crippled in mind and spirit, these need God. But also the strong, the able, the wise, the genius— these also need God, and it does no damage to their self-respect to acknowledge this.

Dr. Foreman

"Reviving the Soul"

Every one of the Psalms expresses some need of man for God. The 19th and 42nd Psalms are not peculiar in this respect. But the 19th contains three phrases, each one referring to God's law, and each expressing a distinct human need which God fulfills. The Christian will think: If all this comes to us in the Law, how much more in the Gospel!

The law of the Lord revives the soul. How weary we grow, how soon we faint! Where is the soul of man? Crushed and starved, beaten down by life's struggles and toils, half forgotten in the bitter competition of the week-days, on Saturday nights or on any night one is tempted to doubt whether one has a soul at all. If the wilted spirit withers further, it will be very near death, indeed many a soul suffers from a kind of perpetual sleeping sickness. We need God to revive the dying soul.

"Making Wise the Simple"

"If youth knew, if age could" is a short poetic form of a proverb, "Too soon old, too late smart." Knowledge can be absorbed by a bright ten-year-old. "Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers." Wisdom is far more than knowledge, it is knowing what to do with knowledge, and how. Calculating machines have knowledge, of a sort, but no machine has wisdom. The greatest wisdom, said Socrates, is realizing how little one has.

The law of God, says the Psalmist, makes wise the simple. Knowledge is something we have to work for, to attain; wisdom is a gift, the true wisdom comes from God who gives to all "generously and without reproaching" as St. James says.

"Rejoicing the Heart"

This world, said some one, is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel. If the walls of a London street were all made transparent, wrote Charles Dickens, who loved his city, and if we could see all the tragedies hidden by brick and stone and wood, the sight would be more than heart could endure. This is a tragic world, and all the joke-making (for indeed some things and people are funny) does not change the state of the world, nor of the heart. When a soul walks in darkness, it is no help to read that the stock market is going up, that spring will follow winter, that somewhere the sun is shining. The heart bowed down knows its own sorrows and a stranger does not intermeddle with his grief. Is it a loss of dignity to need comfort? If so we are a race without dignity. On the contrary, our need of God here as always is our highest dignity. God comes to man not to increase his sorrow but to wipe all tears away. God in his law, God in his Gospel, rejoices the heart.

Warning and Reward

The inspired poet of Psalm 19 sums up in two words what God does for him: Warning and Reward (verse 11). How desperately we need these both! Again man's need of God is high dignity. The plants, the beasts, need no conscience, no warning voice. They cannot choose but do what they are destined to do. But man is free. He can and must make choices, he can make decisions which are tragically, eternally wrong. We need warning. If God did not warn us, it would be a sign he had cast us off. We need reward too. The poet does not say there is reward for the keeping of God's law; there is reward in the keeping; joy in sharing God's holy will.
